If, for example, these cards were only created with utility classes and the padding was to be changed later, the utility class would have to be changed for each card!

The same applies when styling to ID level

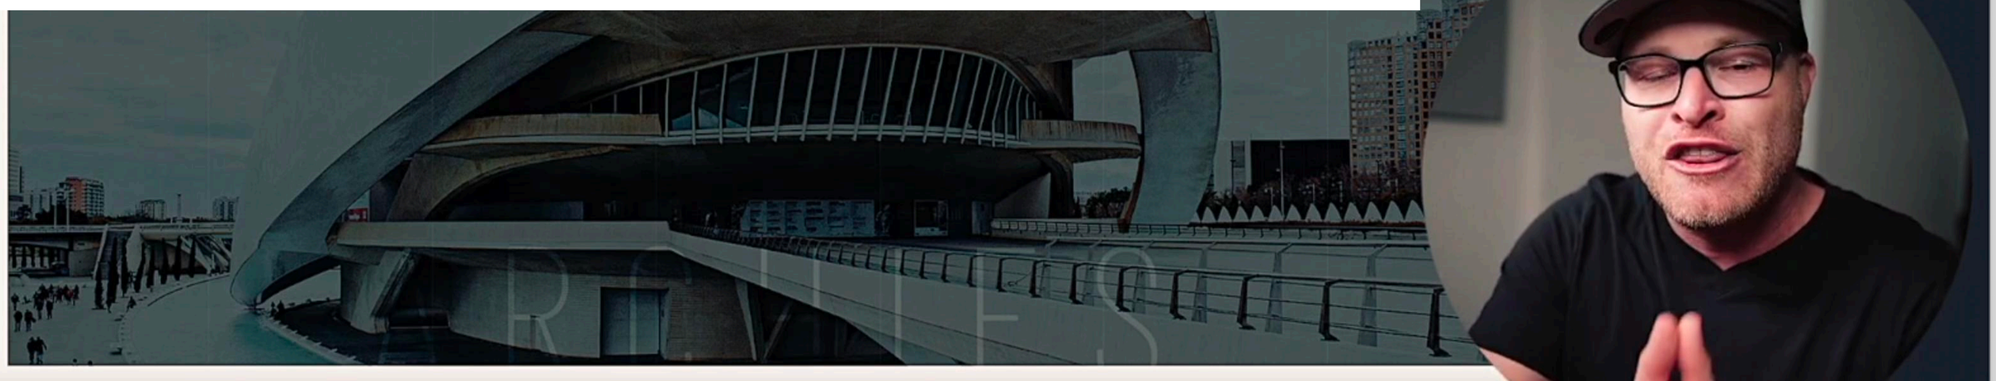
Contextual classes: If they do not exist (e.g. frames start with 'fr-'), it is not possible to trace where this margin has been used. The risk that the page breaks is high.

A context class on the other hand is only meant for this area



Utility Classes vs Custom Classes in ACSS (Best Practices).mp4

‘content-gap‘ is a contextual class

This is a variable from ACSS

Here you can explain the beauty of classes well. If the list items were styled on ID level, you would have to change every single element individually when changing the color. For us the change of a single class is enough!
